The bonnet, once upon a time, was head dress. Fine old English gentlemen down to the early part of the Six-teenth century wore bonnets of cloth, allk or velvet, more or less ornamented, according to the rank or the taste of the wearer. These coverings, how-ever, were superseded by the hat in all the lengths and breadth of the kingdom, save in Scotland, where it still retains its ancient name.

The good old "braid bonnet" was broad, round and flat. It overshadowed the face and neck; it could be slouched in front, behind or side or two of land, wore it as a badge of distinction and were called "bonnet lairds."—Millinery Trade Review.
